Execution Space

Re: Shopify Developer, contract

Dear Mr. Christensen and the Execution Space team,

Your migration page says to reconcile the counts and then “spot-check the edges”. I wanted to see what that looks like when the check runs on every record, so I built one:
mousabatarseh.com/execution-space-proposal.

It is a working check on a synthetic catalog of 412 products and 1,186 variants. Every count matches after the move, and 65 products still arrive wrong: handles rebuilt from titles, SKUs that lost their leading zeros in a spreadsheet, case packs dropped because one custom field had no mapping. You can flip each migration rule and watch one record, the redirect map and a BLOCK, REVIEW or READY gate recalculate. The map downloads in Shopify’s import format.

At Universal Wholesale I ran catalogs of 14,000+ SKUs, and I led a platform migration that kept the redirects and URL structure intact. I built and ran the United Textile store on Shopify, with wholesale prices hidden until login. Since then I built ChangeAtlas, which compares an export with a baseline before an import goes live, and CSV Mapper, which maps supplier files to twelve Shopify and WooCommerce import templates.

You should know where I am thinner. I have not administered a Shopify Plus store and I have not shipped a Shopify app. The export script and the redirect import validate against the Admin GraphQL schema but have not run against a live store, and the Liquid section passes Theme Check but I have not previewed it in a theme. My degree is in accounting information systems, which may be why I check the numbers first.

I build with Claude every day and review what it produces. If the check looks useful, the smallest next step is on the page: one migration, one question, whether the data is ready to cut over. Twenty minutes would be enough to decide if that is worth trying.

Respectfully,

Mousa Batarseh
